

That's it?

From the looks of tonight's packed house meeting at the Crowne Plaza, it appears that Bob is not willing to compromise at all. His "revision" is a farce and is laid out in great detail by Ponte Vista blogger Mark Wells here.

The only thing I have to say is, this guy is more clueless than I thought. 1,950 units? Are you kidding?

By all accounts, lowering the number from 2,300 to 1,950 units is a pathetic gesture. Janice was quick to criticize the "revision," stating she was "disappointed" that the numbers weren't "at least a little bit lower."

Though the Community Advisory Committee also offered several proposals about what should be built on the old navy site, Planning official Betsy Weisman confirmed that the CAC's recommendation is not binding.

The only interesting bit in Bisno's pitch came when he indicated that rooftop photo-voltaics would be used in the new development. As usual, he did not commit to making the entire project utilize solar cells on its roofs, only stating that there would be some used -- translation? very few will have them because of the huge cost, or they will be available at the owner's expense.

So what now?

My guess is, Bisno will move ahead with his new proposal and submit the appropriate material to the city's planning department -- with or without a recommendation from the Community Advisory Committee. It is clear he does not intend to meet the CAC's numbers, so he'll proceed without them.
